How comes it that man is provided with this large and apparently useless, not to say dangerous, reserve of digestive power we may reply that it is probably related to the fact that his primitive ancestors were not infrequently compelled to submit to prolonged fasts, so that it became necessary at times, and as opportunity offered, to consume and be capable of digesting a superabundance of food, and in those precarious times there was little danger of this reserve power being abused by chronic over-eating. It must further be remembered in this connection that the sedentary life led by many moderns renders their food requirements comparatively small, and hence, if they keep within physiological needs, they must possess a large margin of digestive reserve. On the other hand, in the case of those who expend a great deal of muscle energy and whose food-requirements are correspondingly great, e. g. navvies working ten hours daily, the reserve of digestive capacity is very much less, and they are certainly much less liable to consume more food than is needful. How large is the reserve of the digestive system is well shown by the fact that a considerable portion of that system can be removed or put out of action without causing any serious inconvenience. A dog has lived for five years after the removal of its stomach, and eight or ten feet of the intestine can be excised from man without any apparent harm; moreover, surgery has taught...
